

Teacher Feedback Series: Light of the World

Here's a twist. How about inviting some honest peer evaluation? Friends, co-workers, ministry partners and other adults can help you be a better teacher. Ask someone whom you trust to come and give you feedback on your next lesson. Choose someone who is honest enough to give you useful feedback and gentle enough not to derail your emotional life forever (unless you need that).

1. Record here the name of one person who could observe a session in the next month and give you feedback on it.

2. Contact that person and invite them to a lesson within the next month. Check here I you have done that.

☐ I did it!

3. Circle three to five of these questions that you would like your observer to answer. Add your own if you like:

- a. What do you think that the students are learning in the session?
- b. What is the most engaging aspect of the session?
- c. Am I giving equal consideration to all?
- d. What suggestions for improvement would you make?
- e. What is the one area you think I most need to concentrate on?
- f. Do you think the content and language are appropriate?
- g. _____
- h. _____

Finally, record his or her insights here and highlight the most useful. What will you try as a result of his or her feedback?
